

I am commenting to support the classification of Internet as a Title II utility. Supporting a free and open Internet is entirely necessary for a free and open society. If Internet Service Providers are allowed to restrict the data they send based on what it is and/or who it is going to they will have too much control over how we as a society access information. They will be able to control what people watch, how it is watch, and how much is charged for it. As it stands ISPs face too little competition and in some areas of the country are essentially extorting their customers.

The internet is no longer a newfangled fancy invention used exclusively by nerds, college professors, and computer geeks. In the 21st century the internet is absolutely essential for everyday life in the developed world, and as such should remain free from ISP tampering.

I submit for you what the internet is sure to look like if the Internet is declassified as a Title II utility. This is not good for the American people, this is only good the corporations. You have to dig deep and ask yourselves: Do I serve the American people? Or do I serve my own interests and greed?
